Japan earthquake: Tsunami hits north-east

Japan's most powerful earthquake since records began has struck the north-east coast, triggering a massive tsunami.

-1- Cars, ships and buildings were swept away by a wall of water after the 8.9-magnitude tremor, which struck about 400km north-east of Tokyo. A state of emergency has been declared at a nuclear power plant, where pressure has exceeded normal levels. Officials say 350 people are dead and about 500 missing, but it is feared the final death toll will be much higher. In one ward alone in Sendai, a port city in Miyagi prefecture, 200 to 300 bodies were found.

-2- In the centre of Tokyo, many people are spending the night in their offices. But thousands, perhaps millions, chose to walk home. Four trains are missing along the coast, says Japan Railways; and a ship carrying 100 people was swept away. As aftershocks rattled the country, residents and workers in Tokyo rushed outside to gather in parks and open spaces. Train services were suspended, stranding millions of commuters in the Japanese capital. About four million homes in and around Tokyo suffered power cuts.

-3- Japan's ground self-defense forces have been deployed, and the government has asked the US military based in the country for help. The scale of destruction from the biggest quake ever recorded in Japan will become clear only at first light. The quake was the fifth-largest in the world since 1900 and nearly 8,000 times stronger than the one which devastated Christchurch, New Zealand, last month, said scientists.

-4- Thousands of people living near the Fukushima nuclear power plant have been ordered to evacuate. Japanese nuclear officials said pressure inside a boiling water reactor at the plant was running much higher than normal after the cooling system failed. Officials said they might need to deliberately release some radioactive steam to relieve pressure, but that there would be no health risk.

-5- The tsunami rolled across the Pacific at 800km/h - as fast as a jetliner - before hitting Hawaii and the US West Coast, but there were no reports of major damage from those regions. Thousands of people were ordered to evacuate coastal areas in the states of California, Oregon and Washington.

Facebook was launched in February 2004 as an alternative to the traditional student directory. Its initial success with college students was greatly attributed to the provision of an information service that was not available offline – an interactive student directory containing each student's class schedule and social network. Facebook did not create a community where one never existed before; rather it provided an important information and communication service to a pre-existing offline community. While students already had a loose affiliation with all fellow students at a college, they didn't have an easy way to learn more about their fellow students outside their direct social network. Given the large class sizes at most universities today, students don't have the opportunity to interact with very many of their classmates during class. More importantly, initial Facebook usage was indeed driven by dating type activity – checking people in, learning more about get-togethers, light tracking type of activity, etc.

Qualifications are so important these days. Many years ago a university degree (has been/was/had been) enough. It's true that a B.A or a B.Sc would (guarantee/guaranty/guaranteed) you a good job. Not now! Not even a Master degree is (available/enough/applicant) these days. Actually, it seems that everyone has a Master degree; some of the jobs I want now (apply/qualify/require) a Ph.D. It is also not sufficient nowadays to be happy (by/of/with) the qualifications you have as you have to keep your (diplomas/qualifications/graduation) up-to-date. It seems that life has become one long certificate (hunting/making/looking at) especially so now that many people will have several careers in their life; for instance, I know someone who (get/get/got) a degree in Physics and then became an accountant and didn't like it so he further studied to be a lawyer!
